Abstract:

The main problem of approximation theory is to resolve a complicated target function by a sequence of functions of small complexity. In linear approximation, the approximating functions are chosen from pre-specified finite-dimensional vector spaces. However, in many problems one can gain considerably by allowing the approximation method to "adapt" to the target function. The